RAG stands for Retrieval Augmented Generation. It allows language models to answer questions using external documents instead of only their training data.

Embeddings convert sentences into vectors so that similarity between meanings can be calculated mathematically.

Chunking is the process of splitting large documents into smaller meaningful sections before storing them.

Vector databases store embeddings and allow fast semantic search instead of keyword search.

RAG systems reduce hallucination by grounding answers in retrieved context.